Individual supervising teachers have shared their concern in the DRC over the insistence on the part of the University Administration that they sign ~~on~~ the individual bills of the Contingency bills/vouchers submitted by the research scholars working with them. They will only forward the bills with their signature. As the expenses incurred are committed by the scholars themselves the supervising teachers cannot be made accountable for the expenses. For the last four years the supervising teachers have not been made accountable for the same. Hence the supervising teachers strongly feel that the earlier practice be continued.

LCL5017 Edward Said and the Question of Subjectivity

This course seeks principally to discover the notions of subjectivity in the protocols of Edward Said. While doing this, it also examines Said as a subject implicated in and/ or constituted by the colonial experience and the vast ensemble of his own writings. Though Said never comes out with explicit theories of subjectivity, it is not too difficult to see that the latent idea of a political subject is a running strand in his protocols. His is a voice that argues for a subject of action or for an individual human agent at a time when the death of the subject is being celebrated in academic circles.

By the end of the course, students are expected to be able to understand: Saidian contrapuntal methodology; the profound shift in his Intellectual trajectory from a Foucauldian anti-humanist paradigm to a humanist and left secular tradition; his critique of dominant discourses such as Orientalism and Imperialism, his protocols on the role of intellectuals, his concept of exilic subjectivity and above all his uncompromising espousal of the ‘grand-narratives’ of emancipation and liberation that serve as counter hegemonic/ideological strategies to resist the subjection of individuals.
