ABSTRACT:

The displacement of people refers to the forced movement of people from their locality or environment and occupational activities. This is caused by a number of factors such as an armed conflict, natural disasters, famine, development and economic changes can also be causes of displacement. In case of displacement of people for development, there are two types such as direct displacement, which leads to actual displacement of people from their locations and indirect displacement, which leads to a loss of livelihood. However, this paper has conceptualized the concepts of development and displacement, covered an evolution of the development concept, theories of development, forms of displacement, consequences of displacement of people for development and finally although, displacement of people for development is not encourageable and can be avoidable, but still this is inevitable because some displacements of people have happening in most of the states for their developmental purposes. So, this paper has investigated regarding what are the various propositions available for a humanistic displacement of people for development of their respective states, which they can utilize suitable suggestions for their requirements in the world.

I. INTRODUCTION:

Development is a plural and multi-dimensional concept. This has been using in various contexts. The study on development has rose to prominence after 1945. In the post second world war period, development was something which was largely focussed on a nation State. Moreover, not only the development has emerged as a major issue of concern in the States after the world war two, in the context of cold war period and also after end of colonial empires, which resulted an emergence of new sovereign states (Kiely Ray article in an edited book, 2012,p.420).

As far as the concept of development is concerned, its aim is to achieve a better life and freedom to choose (Sen Amartya article in an edited book, 2007, p.16).

The concept of development implies changes, in which it describes the process of economic and social transformation within their respective countries in the World. The question is how to measure the development?. Indexes used for measuring the development are economic growth targets, economic development, per capita income, purchasing power parity (PPP), basic needs approach, physical quality of life, human development, gender development, removal of human poverty, and entitlements to people etc(Gupta K.R., 2011, p.1).

When we speak of a developed society development, in this one can expect that people have to well fed &
